Spirit Masks of the Old Coastal Bering Sea Yupik Culture "Two-Headed Walrus"

The Coastal Bering Sea Yupik people believed that every object, whether living or natural, had some form of a spirit called Inua. There were people chosen to communicate with the spirit world known as "Angalkut" (ah-ng-ah lih-good) or medicine men/women. The Angalkut also designed the mask in their own representation of a spirit. The walrus is featured in the mask design.

The spirit, portrayed as a human face, is shown on the back or the front of the walrus. The spirit of strength is the center of the mask, and everything radiates from it.

The appendages (such as the "hoops" (attached around the mask) symbolize many different things.

The diagonal sticks attached to the mask, and base support for the appendages and the hoops, symbolize the four seasons: Fall (top left) Winter (upper right); Spring (lower right); Summer (lower left).

The horizontal sticks attached to both hoops represent the four directions: North (top), South (bottom), West (left); and East (right). The inner hoop represents the earth and the outer, the skies and the atmosphere.

Lastly, various appendages represent certain themes: Circles, some with dots, symbolize the male and female power symbols. For the male, a solid dot at the center; female, a small circle at the center.
